

Conflict-finder Sentences

Written by Carol Webster Jochim

Word-boundary conflicts are those sometimes strange translations that occur when the same stroke is used for either a word beginning and a word ending, or a word and a word beginning/ending. For example, you might write the sentence, "This toy lets children be creative" but have it translate as "This toilets children be creative." This kind of conflict is not one that is easily evident when looking at translation dictionaries; it tends to pop up during translation (realtime or not) in the most surprising places and sometimes in the most embarrassing ways! The challenge is to proactively find your conflicts and begin to eliminate them so your translation is cleaner, resulting in better realtime skills and less editing time.

(NOTE: Some translation software has optional features which automatically make some necessary spelling adjustments when attaching common endings such as: "ed, ing, s, er." Consequently, exact translation may vary, depending upon the CAT software being used.)

Since this document was first published in 1999 some theory vendors have added word groups to their translation dictionaries to accomplish correct translation on some of these sentences. This is one way to deal with conflicts, but grouped entries then need to be extended to all possible ways that conflict may occur.
